

PROGRAM: EVERYDAY LIFE

THE CITY IN THE YEAR 1627

Like walking through a history book, that is what awaits you when entering the historic city center. The Grolse (inner city) residents pull out all the stops to appear as good as possible and historically justified during the event. In combination with the various traders, crafts, entertainment and 17th-century hospitality, you can experience and taste what a day in the life of "citizens and people" looked like in 1627.

WHAT DO WE DO WITH THE CHILDREN?

How would life have been for children in the 17th century? There was no television, mobile telephone or computer game. But it is certain that they did not get bored, because children enjoyed themselves with completely different things. Much of it can be seen and done at various places in the city!

PROGRAM: BATTLEFIELD AND RE-ENACTMENT

GET READY FOR THE BATTLE!

Drills

In the camps you can see how the soldiers sleep, eat and have fun. But there must also be practice for the siege. The drills show how you can let a large group do exactly what is intended from the leadership above, following standard commands.

Public access Battlefield

How does the battlefield look like at close range, how wide is such a trench actually, and how does the battery with guns look like from above? Come and take a look behind the scenes! The pioneers (the soldiers who build the trenches with everything that goes with it) give an explanation on the spot.

Battle

The battle on the Battlefield looks different every day. Just as in 1627, the trenches become longer every day, so that the Spaniards and the citizens of Grol are taking more heat every day. Occasionally the cavalry of the Spaniards fails. However, the State army is increasingly advancing. After the battle the tired soldiers return to their camps. The wounded are taken to the hospital in the city.

Cards and dice

On Saturday you can see how soldiers waste their wages with playing cards and dice. This will be represented by, among others, the Finnish group GARS. Be warned, because such games sometimes get out of hand.
